

What I Hate About Social Network Addicts

Fine...It's cool when you tweet about your dazzling experience with a limousine service San Jose, CA company. But how you fought with your girlfriend inside your SUV limousine San Jose, CA service and the reasons why? C'mon! That is just so private and I don't want to know about it (that rhymed).

Think about it. We want people to admire us even if the way to do it is virtually. Now, instead of saying you had fun riding a wedding transportation in Watsonville, CA, you stop for awhile and tweet about going to the bathroom. That is just not interesting and definitely, in some ways, plainly disgusting. If you are within San Jose and you will only tweet about eating your lunch, then do us a big favor. Hire an airport limo service San Jose, CA based company, board a plane, and jump off. Please spare the poor Quinceaneras, San Jose, Ca is proud of.

Another thing is private posts. An acquaintance of a friend is a guy who does things according to the Wild Side Code of Ethics. He has a girlfriend, who like him, loves to do naughty stuff. They are both happy and in love like nothing will ever break them. It's about fun, booze, and love. All that changed when girlfriend found out that her private pictures were viewed by some people when it was intentionally and supposedly for the guy's eyes only. Apparently, the girl sent those pictures through Facebook's private message option. Way to go!

Redundancy is idleness. This is true for people who keep updating us with the same information. Example, a guy tweets something about his plans for the day. That's all good until he said that it was time for that plan to be put into practice. Then, he tweets about how things go. Lastly, he tweets the results. Last lastly, he tweets about how happy he was. Dude, boy, man, addict, skip the redundancy and limit your scientific method into three tweets – the plan, the results, the lessons. Instead of saying you are going to do this, doing it, and done doing it, why not tweet about the lesson you got from the experience? That would surely interest people, maybe open up debates or wage war. Now, that's what I call internet revolution.

Lastly, stop posting your businesses so frequently. Let me be clear on that one. Frequently means more than eight times. We are still struggling to get up from the economic breakdown that pounded us into the depths of the earth. It is just justified to be more creative in advertising our products. I know you are studying this article objectively and found out that it contains links to some businesses and that's just what I mean.

However, angling your points by inserting too much noticeable ads ruins your credibility. You tweet and post because you love doing it. Go ahead and advertise discreetly (if you know what I mean) but you have to know when to stop. Position your ads above, midway, or under your articles without being too redundant. This way, people could still appreciate logic inside your brain structures and not your profit-based neurotransmissions.
