

If Only Mending A Broken Friendship Is Anything Like Furniture Restoration

Mid-days were once spent lunching in charming bistros, afternoons sipping chamomile infused teas and nights going wild out on the town. But as it was meant to be, the best of friends became the worst of enemies. If only mending a broken friendship was as easy as Dallas furniture restoration.

How it started, no one could tell, let alone admit that it was either person's own doing. There was pointing of fingers and bashing and hurting but never was there admitting of faults. Exchanges between them were like straight out of "Little Red Hen"; not I's all over the place. Sad if you ask those who knew them, their friendship is what you can call a rare antique in Carrollton.

They started as the best of friends and ended as, well, no one can say exactly what, just yet. After all there's antique restoration in Dallas, an apt analogy if you will. Those who knew them could only offer the most typical of advice: say sorry and mean it. Ah, not I's turned into why should I's.

And then eventually things started to turn sweet – from sour and bitter, that is. Apparently someone decided to make the first move and actually 'say sorry and mean it'. All it took was a simple handwritten letter that showed sincerity above all else. There were I miss you's and can we talk's. Before they knew it they were friends again. It was as though they had furniture refinishing in Dallas as things were going rather smoothly in just an instant.

But others who were too keen noticed that it wasn't the same as before. There seemed to be some sort of barrier though not visible to the naked eye. But that was better than being in all-out war, yes? And so they carried on convincing themselves 'everything was okay'.

But unlike having upholstery repair in Fort Worth, the kind wherein not a single trace of damage can be found, their friendship was noticeably tainted. Perhaps it didn't matter how sorry either of them said they were, how much they wanted to turn back that moment in time or how much they value the friendship they used to have and want to have back. Maybe mending a broken friendship isn't anything like antique restoration wherein you can bring back the original beauty and luster of furniture. Ah, who can tell, really? That's what 'maybe' and 'perhaps' are for.
